Fields and Habitus

- Social life is a series of games that occurs in fields, where Bourdieu uses a football (i.e., soccer) field as a metaphor for field theory.
- The players on the field each have a position and a set of rules, or "doxa," to play the game.
- Each position within the field is determined by the individual's habitus, e.g., their past performance, skills, education, social class and upbringing all asserting influence.
